Elmer Fudd had spent the morning weeding his carrot patch. Now he was ready to prune the trees in his orchard. He was perched on the top of a ladder, busy at work, when he caught sight of Bugs Bunny heading in his direction.

"Oh, no!" Elmer complained. "I have too much work to do to get involved with Bugs and his 'hare-bwained' business deals. I had better hide up here in this twee, where the leaves are so thick he won't be able to find me."

"How odd," Bugs muttered, when he reached the very apple tree Elmer had been pruning. "I thought I saw my old pal Fuddsy working out here in the orchard. Oh, well," he remarked when he noticed the empty ladder, "he can't be too far away." Then, as he saw the tree quiver a little, Bugs added knowingly, in a loud voice that Elmer was sure to hear, "I'll just sit here in the shade and wait until he shows up."

He plucked a nice, juicy, ripe apple from a low branch of the tree and began munching. "MMM. Not bad. Not as good as a crispy carrot, but not bad at all," Bugs muttered as he munched.

This was too much for poor Elmer. "That wascal! First he eats my apple, then he insults it," Elmer thought to himself. He was so angry that he accidentally-on-purpose dropped an apple. It fell to the ground, just missing Bugs's head.

Bugs looked up into the tree. "What's up, Doc? Besides you, that is?" he asked, calmly ignoring the fallen apple. "Come on down. I want to talk to you about business."

"All wight. I'll come down," Elmer glowered, "but don't think you can twick me into going into any business enterpwize with you, you cwazy wabbit," he added with determination, as he descended.

"Why, Doc," Bugs gasped in mock surprise. "How could you think that I would trick you? I only want to borrow a small piece of your lawn to open a roadside juice stand."

"Well," Elmer mused, thinking that this might be one way to keep Bugs so busy he wouldn't bother him all day, "all wight."

"It's a deal, Doc," Bugs agreed. "You'll never regret it. Thanks," he called as he hurried away to open his juice stand.

"It's a cwazy idea," Elmer called after Bugs's retreating figure. "You won't get any customers. Nobody walks past here. It's too close to the fweeway. Twaffic is too heavy for the cars to stop." He shrugged when Bugs didn't answer and went back to his pruning.

A little later, Elmer stopped. "This is hot work," he sighed. "I think I'll just stwoll over to that wabbit's juice stand and get a cool, wefweshing dwink of lemonade. He will pwobably be glad to have one customer."

When Elmer reached the juice stand, he was amazed. Cars were double-parked and people were waiting in line for a drink. Then he saw the sign. He read aloud, "Cawwot juice. Last chance before you get on the fweeway. Cool, wefweshing, and good for your eyesight.

"Why, that wascally wabbit. I'll bet he's using the cawwots from my garden."

Elmer fumed. Then he had an idea. He took a place in the long line and waited, a sly gleam in his eye.

"Oh, hiya, Doc." Bugs grinned a sheepish grin as Elmer's turn in line came.

"I'll take a glass of cawwot juice. If I'm going to be your business partner, it will help me keep a sharp eye on the pwofits," Elmer chuckled.
